My Dream Job

When I grow up. I want to be a businessman. Now you may think I want the job just for money, and, well, you're not wrong. But, you're not exactly right, either. I want to be a businessman because the money that I earn makes me be able to be very generous to people and charity organizations.

And how will I get the job? Well, there are some qualities I need. First of all, I need to be creative so that I can come up with good ideas for producers. I also need to be forward-thinking, so that I can predict if the product will be popular and practical. I need to be quick at Maths, so I can decide whether to sell my product ideas (patents) to other companies. And most importantly, I need to be persuasive. So that, I can design good commercials and make more people buy my products. Also, I'll manage my business in an office.

Now, every business has its ups and downs, and I want to talk about that. I could release a popular product, and I'd try to improve it and get more sales. Hopefully, my company will get an award from a well-known organization for "Product of the Year", but anything else is fine too. In the worst cases, one of my employees may be accused of money laundering, but I'd just fire them if so.

I'm preparing for this job by persuading people to change their minds, and it's working nicely.

Being a businessman is perfect for money-loving individuals (like me) and I do hope I'll get the job in the future.
